Monday, May 9, 2022

Write.Together

Last week, we received lots of mail about ending post-summer regret. Many of you were able to make a strategic plan for the summer without difficulty, but it was the development of a support system that left you confused. All the queries seemed to all boil down to three questions: 1) What types of writing groups exist? 2) How do I figure out which type of writing group is right for me? and 3) If I were just more motivated and disciplined then I wouldn’t need a group, so how can I change myself? Because having a support system is critical to actually executing your summer plan, we want to dedicate this week’s Monday Motivator to the many different kinds of writing groups and what makes them either flounder or flourish as support systems.

Researchers have demonstrated that accountability and support increase writing productivity among new faculty members. And yet, when graduate students, post-docs, and new faculty talk about needing support that goes beyond substantive feedback, they’re sometimes met with some form of shaming: "Why do you need a support group?" "Can’t you just motivate yourself to write?" (Ironically, this often comes from folks who’ve enjoyed more privilege in their careers or magically forgot that someone once had to hold their hands early on in their career).

While it should go without saying, it’s OK to have needs. In fact, if you wait until you are perfectly motivated, flawlessly self-disciplined, free from anxiety, utterly fearless, intellectually energized, and emotionally resolved before you start writing this summer, you may never begin! Instead, we want to encourage you to release yourself from the idea that having needs means there’s something wrong with you. It’s OK if you need support and accountability. It’s OK if you’re not productive in isolation. It’s OK if you need community, feedback, a safe space to take risks, and a group of people who genuinely celebrate your accomplishments. It’s OK because meeting your needs for community, support, and accountability will not only increase your productivity but also your enjoyment of summer writing.

What do YOU need?

If you can accept the fact that you don’t have to change who you are in order to be productive, then we want you to dig just a little deeper by asking yourself: What do I need to maximize my writing this summer? Academic writers have lots of different needs. For example, some people need to physically share space with others while writing, while some need a stern authority figure to answer to. Some people need solitude and the kind of support that is silent, while others need regular cheerleading from their peers. Some need quantitative accounting of their progress, while others need substantive feedback from those in their specialty field to stay motivated. Some people need therapy, and others need an occasional exorcism (from the demons of bad academic socialization). It’s even OK if you need all of these things at different times! The important thing is to identify what you need without judgment, shame, or self-flagellation. Knowing what you truly need to maximize your productivity is what will allow you to construct a writing support system that is effective for YOU.

Connect with a writing group that meets your needs.

Once you have identified your basic needs, start to imagine the best way to get them met. We’re going to describe a few different types of writing groups for the dual purpose of expanding your sense of what a "writing group" looks like and illustrating the importance of letting your needs guide your selection of an appropriate group. It’s really quite simple: Writing groups flourish when everyone’s needs are being met and flounder when they don’t meet the primary needs of members.

Traditional Writing Groups

When we use the term "writing group," the most common form that comes to mind is a small number of people who commit to a specific period of time (e.g., a summer) to meet face-to-face, once-a-month, for the purpose of reading, critiquing, and providing substantive feedback on each other’s written work. This requires a commitment of 5-8 hours per month to read other people’s work, draft comments, show up, and engage during the meeting time. Such groups tend to work well if the participant’s primary need is substantive feedback and if members are able to provide that for one another. This structure is less effective when participants have other more pressing needs (support or ongoing accountability) and/or the feedback is the sort that could be obtained more efficiently from a professional editor.

Writing Accountability Groups

If your primary need is to have a committed group of people to answer to each week, then writing accountability groups may be worth trying. The structure is fairly simple: four people agree to meet once a week during the summer (either face-to-face or by conference call). The groups meet for exactly one hour per week and each person gets 15 minutes to discuss the following items: 1) my writing goals for last week were _______, 2) I did/did not meet them, 3) if I didn't meet them, it’s because of _______ and 4) my writing goals for next week are _______. Developing a daily writing routine tends to bring up people’s stuff, and the group helps to support one another by identifying the limiting beliefs and behaviors that hold members back from productivity. Nobody reads anyone else's writing in this type of group. Instead, the focus is on the writing process and moving projects forward so they can get into the hands of people with subject matter expertise (not group members). This structure works well when the participants' primary needs are accountability, support, community, and peer mentoring. It is ineffective when individuals cannot sustain the weekly commitment to the group or daily writing and/or their primary need is for ongoing substantive feedback.

Write-On-Site

If you’re someone who needs to be around others when you’re writing and/or you feel isolated, a Write-On-Site group may work well for you. It's also very straightforward. An organizer selects a time and place for a meeting and disseminates that information to a group of interested others. At the appointed time, people descend on the designated space, and everyone writes. Everything else is optional; there can be a weekly attendance commitment (or not), the group can range from two people (writing buddies) to as many people as the space will hold, and it can occur in a public or private space. There's no reading each other's work, and there's no discussion during the writing time; it's just about getting into the same physical space and actually engaging in the act of writing. The collective writing energy of the group is energizing, and people are free to come early and stay late for socializing. Like every structure we're describing, this works well when participants are getting their needs met (everyone comes to write). It doesn't work well when people arrive and their primary needs are support, substantive feedback, or processing why they are stuck.

Online Writing Groups

There are a variety of online writing groups that are designed to provide support, accountability, and tracking progress over time. Some are free and some cost money, but essentially the structure is the same. Participants commit to a period of daily writing, check-in each day at the end of their writing time, track their daily progress over time, and engage in discussion about writing with other participants. If you subscribe to a fee-based service, your progress will be automatically transformed into beautiful charts and tables, and you will receive the additional accountability of electronic contact with a writing coach. This support system works well for people who need daily support and encouragement, feel isolated in some way, and/or find electronic relationships are genuinely satisfying and significant enough to elicit the feeling of accountability. This support structure is less suitable for people who need face-to-face contact and interaction in order to feel a tangible sense of accountability and community.

Writing Coaches

It may be the case that you have a variety of needs but your schedule disallows you from committing to any kind of group for the summer. Or alternatively, you have no idea what you need, and you would like to work with a professional to figure it out. There is a variety of writing coaches out there who will consult with you weekly (for fees ranging from $75-$150 per hour) to increase your awareness of what's holding you back and help you to develop and implement strategies to move you forward. Coaches work well for people who either aren’t clear about what their needs are or need more personalized and intense accountability than a group can provide. Of course, this doesn’t work for people for whom the mere idea of being coached feels oppressive.

Bootcamps

Some people have tried various groups but keep running into the same problems: they struggle to find others who will stick to their commitments, and/or they don’t know what to do when they face their own resistance day after day. The advantage of bootcamps is that they provide a professionally facilitated group, intense structure, and are filled with people who have made a commitment by investment. That’s a nice way of saying that in groups where everyone has paid to participate, commitment to the group tends to be very high! This high level of commitment, structure, and accountability combined with the attention of a dedicated coach tend to result in tremendous transformations in productivity. That said, bootcamps are not for everyone because they require a willingness to experiment with new writing behaviors, continually question your beliefs about writing, and force you to explore the fears and anxiety that underlie your resistance to writing.

We currently use all of these mechanisms at once! We know that if left to our own devices, we will not write. We’ll be very productive in every other imaginable way, but we won’t write. Over the years we have come to accept the fact that we need community, support, and accountability, and instead of judging ourselves negatively for having those needs, we embrace them, create mechanisms to meet them, and find that participating in these types of supportive systems brings us increased productivity and tremendous joy. You may have different (and fewer) needs than we do, but the key to having a productive, fulfilling, and enjoyable summer is to ask yourself: What do I need, and what kind of writing group will best support my needs?

The Weekly Challenge

This week, we challenge you to:
● Ask yourself: What do I need to support my writing this summer?
● If you find yourself reactive to the idea of having needs, or to answering this simple question, gently ask yourself: Why?
● Consider what it would mean to accept your needs as part of who you are (as opposed to trying to fix them).
● Imagine a support structure that would meet your needs and support your writing.
● Join one, if it already exists, and create it if it doesn't.
● Consider joining us for an upcoming Faculty Bootcamp if you're at a complete loss.

We hope this week brings you the clarity to identify your needs, the freedom to embrace them, and the creativity to connect with mechanisms of support that will allow you to maximize your productivity this summer and develop a sustainable daily writing routine.

Warmly,

Kerry Ann Rockquemore, PhD
Founder, NCFDD

Anthony Ocampo, PhD
Academic Director, NCFDD

Copyright © 2022 National Center for Faculty Development & Diversity, All rights reserved.